All this time efforts to stop the boat's machinery were of no use, and for five minutes it kept pushing the steamer further under the apron and tearing her bow into splinters. When steam was blown off the engine finally stopped. Passengers Plundered by a Gang of Toughs on Eighth Avenue.

NO POLICEMAN WAS IN SIGHT.

Pedestrians Also Compelled to Stand and Deliver Up Valuables.

IT WAS A REIGN OF ROUGHS.

Only Two Arrests Made After the Roughs Had Beaten Many People.

A gang of white and colored toughs, who have recently made life miserable for the dwellers in upper Hudson street and the vicinity, capped the climax of their depredations last night when they held up an Eighth Avenue horse car and "went through" the passengers in Western style.

The gang have been robbing pedestrians who were abroad at night, and their onslaughts on the crowds attracted by chowder party parades and public gatherings have been the subject of story after story in the newspapers.

An Eighth avenue car was proceeding uptown on Hudson street at about 11.45 o'clock. There were a few ladies in the car and enough men to comfortably fill it.

The crowd of thieves, numbering ten or tweive, had marched down Hudson street from Thirteenth. Twice they had shouted "Fire!" and "Police!" in the hope of attracting a crowd, but Ninth Ward residents have grown careful in the last two months, and scarcely any one paid heed to the calls.

At Hank street they met the car. Two of them stopped at the horses heads and held them, while the rest boarded the car, and with oaths and shouts terrified the passengers, while they "went through" them. They reaped a rich harvest of watches, jewelry, pocket-books and loose money.

There was no policeman in sight at the time, but Officer Forrester, of the Charles street station, heard the noise from his post on Greenwich street. He boarded the rear end of the car, whistling for ald at the same time. His appearance put a little heart into some of the passengers, who had previously sat like people in trances, and they began to struggle a little with the busy robbers.

Finally one of the passengers, Charles Rithgeber, a steel wire worker, of 12 Ninth avenue, whose watch and chain had been grabbed, started to help the The crowd of thieves, numbering ten
